Hiya Richard,

I hope this finds you well, in good spirit and having a good day. While it has been all quiet on the western front of late, I stumbled upon a website blog and I see that it is not just our age and an interest in Ms. Seven's case which we have in common, I note your past interest in chess and rugby and I suppose my previous guess about your possible military background was not too far off the mark either.

And whilst I don't think anyone would describe me as a polymath, I did study Maths at Poly. I probably did not attain your standards of playing the game, but I was still trying to move the body around the pitch playing rugby league for the police at 44, having been banished from playing union in Ireland at 17.

The death of a chess player while quoting Savielly Tartakower on 10th May 2010 at the Barnley Blitz by the way, was a profound and true story. "In chess, it is always better to sacrifice your opponents pieces than your own."

Savielly Tartakower also once said:

"The tactician must know what to do whenever something needs doing; the strategist must know what to do when nothing needs doing."

Have you ever thought about the consequences, if I am actually correct about JAH being the Second Coming of Christ, by the way?

Out of curiosity, I will listen to your show on Sunday. It would make my day if you played Rikki Don't Lose that Number, on it, but I suspect you may let the matter drop, having done your bit on your last two Big Radio Show broadcasts.

While I would not describe our interactions as "a bit of a wheeze", I sense there is something spiritual going on in higher places.

Regards

Tony
